For according to what is requisite for synthetical unity in general there must be 1 a condition, 2 a conditioned, and 3 the concept which arises from the union of the conditioned with its condition. Kuno Fischer, A Critique of Kant, p. For all faculties or capacities of the soul can be reduced to three, which cannot. There is, then, an unbounded but also inaccessible field for our whole cognitive faculty – the field of the supersensible – wherein we find no territory, and, therefore, can have in it, for theoretical cognition, no realm either for concepts of Understanding or Reason. Thus the contemplation of natural purposes, i. It is a curious literary parallel that St. The pleasure is a priori, independent on the one hand of the charms of sense or the emotions of mere feeling, as Winckelmann had already declared; and on the other hand is a pleasure quite distinct from that taken which we feel when viewing perfection, with which Wolff and Baumgarten had identified it.
